Clustered in groups across Chop Point School’s bayside campus, 242 students from seven area schools gathered Tuesday to participate in the Friends of Merrymeeting Bay biannual Bay Day.

Students, mostly of fourth grade classes, selected three out of more than 20 hands-on activities available to learn about Merrymeeting Bay’s natural resources and conservation practices.

“We’re celebrating biodiversity and encouraging stewardship of the environment,” said Dup Crosson, Friends of Merrymeeting Bay’s coordinator and event organizer. “This is a culmination of our Hands Around the Bay program. We have volunteers here from the state department, marine resources and a lot of local experts who are artists, history buffs and archaeologists.”

Hands Around the Bay is an FOMB bay-based education program geared toward promoting environmental awareness in students. The curriculum is varied, Crosson said, to appeal to different learning types.

Bay Days, held in the spring at Chop Point and in the fall in Bowdoinham, are a “meeting of the minds,” said Crosson, where the goal of the hands-on program is to get the students “muddy, and as involved as possible.”
Among the activities available were beach seining, fish printing, watershed modeling and courses about macroinvertebrates, conservation canines and forest insects.

“Every kid responds differently, so I think the variety of activities here helps connect everybody in a different way,” said Crosson. “Some people make the connection between seeing a fish in a net and what needs to be done to protect that fish. Other people need to do an artform to experience that.”

Students from Chop Point and Woolwich, Georgetown, Bowdoin, Topsham and Bath schools were among those in attendance.
